The Facial Nerve In Temporal Bone and Lateral Skull Base

The temporal branches of the facial nerve. The more anterior branches supply the frontalis, the orbicularis oculi, and corrugator supercilii, and join the supraorbital and lacrimal branches of the ophthalmic. The temporal branch acts as the efferent limb of the corneal reflex.

Temporal branches of the facial nerve. The frontal (or temporal) branch of the facial nerve is a motor nerve that innervates the frontalis and portions of the orbicularis oculi, corrugator supercilii, and procerus muscles. It traverses the superficial fat pad above the superficial temporal fascia toward the lateral brow.

The facial nerve then exits the facial canal (and the cranium) via the stylomastoid foramen. This is an exit located just posterior to the styloid process of the temporal bone.

The Facial Nerve (CN VII) - Course - Functions

The facial nerve is one of the key cranial nerves with a complex and broad range of functions. Although at first glance it is the motor nerve of facial expression which begins as a trunk and emerges from the parotid gland as five branches (see facial nerve branches mnemonic), it has taste and parasympathetic fibers that relay in a complex manner.

Division of the temporal branch of the facial nerve occurred in the parotid gland. The temporal branch of the facial nerve emerged from the parotid gland below the zygomatic arch (Figures 6 and 10) and traversed inside the temporoparietal fascia over the zygomatic arch (Figures 5 and 7) following the Pitanguay line.

Temporal Branch of the Facial Nerve and Its Relationship

Superficial temporal artery anatomy. The temporal branch of the facial nerve (TBFN) also passes through this anatomical region (Figure 1), and innervates the frontalis and orbicularis oculi muscles of facial expression involved in raising the eyebrow on that side to furrow the brow and tightly shutting the eyelid respectively (Fig 1).

The facial nerve travels from the pons through the facial canal in the temporal bone to exit the skull at the stylomastoid foramen. As the facial nerve passes through the temporal bone, several smaller nerves branch off from the main nerve, including the greater (superficial) petrosal nerve and the chorda tympani.

Facial Nerve - Anatomy Pictures and Information

The facial nerve innervates all of the muscles of facial expression. Of these, the facial nerve innervates 14 of the 17 paired muscle groups of the face on their deep side. The three muscles innervated on their superficial or lateral edges are the buccinator, levator anguli oris, and mentalis muscles.
